In Washington more than $1,000,000 a year are expended in the education of the growing generation; an expenditure which brings ample return in increased intelligence, develops the earning power of the individual, and thus adds to the material wealth of the community." "Not alone wealth either," said Mr. West, "because the training of the public schools is of a higher moral standing and the system makes good citizens, who know how to appreciate the function of government and respect the laws which are framed for the benefit of all. "Having thus bestowed, and with lavish hand, the advantage of a free education," he continued, "the government asks something in return. It expects that the boy and girl thus cared for at the public expense shall render to the community in future life the best possible service. You will agree with me, I think, that the government has the right to ask this slight return.

"Pleasant it is to assert, as can be done truthfully and without exaggeration, that in no other city of the country is this debt to the community so completely paid as in the District of Columbia. The bone and sinew of our society is to be found in the young men and women who have graduated from our public schools. They stand today in the highest ranks of their various professions, a credit to themselves and to the wise municipal care which wrought such splendid citizenship out of the raw material of youth."
